The present invention relates to readout systems for charge-coupled devices (CCDs) and in particular to an improved structure and readout method that compensates for variations in the device sensitivity during operation. Charge-coupled devices (CCDs) are used to detect photons and the signals from the CCD can be processed to form a photo or video image. For example, in many machines designed to detect and locate laser beams, the signal from the CCD can be used as an input signal to a servo circuit which steers a telescope in the direction of the detected laser beam. In a semiconductor CCD, photons are collected and stored in an array of microscopic channel regions. When electrons are placed in a channel region, a charge packet consisting of a number of electrons is formed. The sign and number of electrons in each packet is determined by the voltage applied to the gate electrode on top of the channel region. If the region becomes depleted of charge, a 0 is stored in that packet. If charge is added to the region, a +1 is stored. Charge-coupled device operation is enhanced by providing high fields in the channel regions, in the sense that they force the electrons to move down the channel region toward the source/drain electrodes. The resolution of an imaging system using a CCD depends on the number of photons that can be stored in the CCD and hence the number
