Corrosion of workpieces by corrosive attack requires that protective coatings be applied to such workpieces to maintain the integrity of the workpiece. Such protective coatings must meet the following criteria. They must be compatible with the workpiece, they must adhere well to the workpiece and they must be sufficiently resistant to attack by the corrosive medium. The term "workpiece" herein denotes any article of manufacture, the coating of which must be preserved from corrosion in the presence of corrosive attack. Such workpieces include, for example, aircraft and rocket engines, gas turbine blades and vanes, metal parts of gas-turbine engines, heat exchangers in chemical plants, pipes in refineries, primary and secondary reactors in nuclear power plants and so forth. The term "metal" herein denotes any material, the protective coating of which must be preserved from corrosion in the presence of corrosive attack. For example, the material from which such workpieces are made may include titanium, stainless steel, high-nickel alloys, nickel alloys
